The Principles that Guide Our Academic and Certification Programs
In the Department of Special Education

- Learning about teaching is embedded in scholarly understanding and activities. It requires the ability to think about teaching and learning through multiple lenses, with particular attention to behaviorist, information processing and socio-cultural perspectives.

- Central to learning about teaching is learning about effective instruction for students with disabilities, with an understanding of the interactive influences of culture, language, gender, and ability. The learner is viewed as the center of the instructor’s thinking and decision-making regarding teaching and learning.

- Learning to teach requires active learning—the construction of meaningful understandings—not only about the educational needs of students and how to advance students’ learning, but also about the moral and ethical dilemmas that often confront special educators. Learning to teach requires analysis, examination, a reflective stance, and a commitment to life-long learning and educational reform.

- Becoming a teacher is learning to work collaboratively with families and professionals in the school and community in order to design and offer programs that meet the needs of the student and advocate for the student’s rights to appropriate services.

Students admitted and enrolled into the LBS II certification option will be strongly encouraged to pursue the M.Ed. degree in Special Education if they do not hold the degree upon completing the program.

The M.Ed. Program in Special Education was revised in 2002 to reflect current research and best practice in the area of special education, and to align with Illinois State Board of Education standards for accomplished special education teaching. These standards were developed by a panel of experts in special education and are aligned with standards developed by the Council for Exceptional Children, the national professional organization that provides support and guidance to special education professionals.

In particular, the program will provide in-depth study in several domains:

- Foundational knowledge pertaining to educating students with disabilities; with particular emphasis on examining issues of access and equity through historical, political and socio-cultural perspectives;
- Characteristics of students with disabilities, including typical and atypical development along four dimensions: cognition, language, social and emotional functioning;
- Pedagogical approaches focusing on planning, implementing, and assessing students’ academic and social learning performance;
- Models of collaboration for working effectively with families and child-care providers to design and offer effective educational programs;
- An introduction to research design and analysis; and field experiences to advance specific skills and abilities and to better understand the relationship between theory and practice.
